

Selling Gold Jewelry – Frequently Asked Questions

1. What types of gold jewelry can I sell?

You can sell most types of gold jewelry, including rings, necklaces, bracelets, earrings, broken pieces, single earrings, and outdated or unwanted styles.

2. Does broken or damaged gold jewelry still have value?

Yes. Gold jewelry is valued primarily for its gold content, not its condition. Broken or damaged pieces can still be sold based on weight and purity.

3. How is the value of my gold jewelry determined?

Value is based on the gold's purity (karat), weight, and the current market price of gold. Any gemstones are evaluated separately if applicable.

4. What do gold karats mean?

Karat indicates gold purity. Common types include 10K, 14K, 18K, and 24K, with higher karats containing a higher percentage of pure gold.

5. Do I need an appraisal to sell my gold jewelry?

No formal appraisal is required. A professional evaluation will be performed at the time of sale to determine purity and weight.

6. What happens to gemstones when I sell gold jewelry?

Depending on the piece, gemstones may be returned to you, evaluated separately, or factored into the overall offer based on their quality and value.

7. Is selling gold jewelry safe and transparent?

Yes, when working with a reputable buyer. Testing and weighing are typically done in front of you to ensure transparency and trust.

8. How long does the selling process take?

Most gold jewelry transactions can be completed in a single visit, with immediate payment once an offer is accepted.

9. Am I obligated to sell after receiving an offer?

No. You are never required to accept an offer. There is no obligation to sell if you choose not to proceed.

10. Why sell your gold jewelry now?

With strong gold market prices, selling unused or unwanted gold jewelry can be a simple way to turn items you no longer wear into immediate value.
